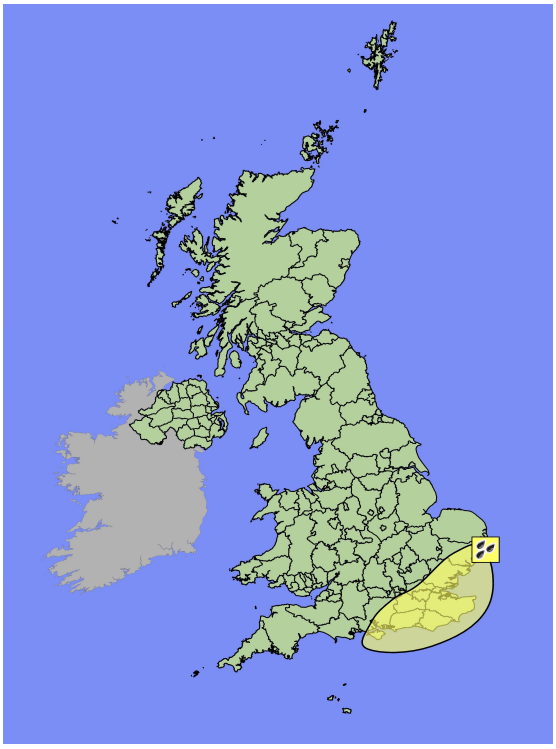
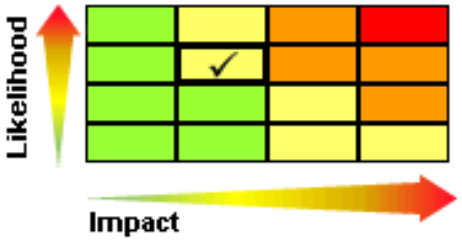
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
The depression which brought the very heavy rain on Sunday night and Monday will gradually drift away southeast into the near continent. The associated front will remain slow-moving across southeast England on Monday night and well into Tuesday bringing further rain in places. There is a risk that the remnants of thunderstorms drifting over from the near continent on Monday evening, could bring some localised heavy downpours, especially overnight. As yet such details remain uncertain but the wettest places could receive a further 15 to 25 mm of rain, although most will see less than this.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Rain

Valid from 00:05 on Tue, 12th Jun 2012 until 12:00 on Tue, 12th Jun 2012

Further rain is likely on Monday night and into Tuesday morning across southeast England and parts of East Anglia, some of which could be heavy. Given that the ground is saturated in places, following recent heavy rainfall, there is a risk of localised surface water flooding as well as possible river flooding - most likely towards Sussex and Hampshire. The public should be aware that this could prolong travel problems in some areas.

The rain should gradually ease from the northwest during Tuesday morning, and the warning now elapses at midday.
